Population Movements in Europe's History

30 June - 8 July 2005

The Academy of European History (AEH) proposes to devote its fourth session in the summer of 2005 to one of our day's most pressing issues: the movement of peoples into and across Europe. An enormous amount of discussion is taking place across Europe on the causes, and consequences of this mass migration of peoples, mostly from the globe's southern and poorer regions, to its northern and more prosperous ones. Much attention has recently been devoted to this phenomenon's demographic dimensions and to its economic and cultural consequences. Whatever one's position on this contemporary pressing issue, one must acknowledge that participants in the current discussion seldom recognize that such movements of people have continuously characterized the history of Europe from the earliest recorded times of its history. In this sense, what is happening today can be considered not so much a new phenomenon as a new chapter of a very long tradition.

Without attempting to be comprehensive or systematic in its coverage, the AEH will seek to examine this historical phenomenon in the perspective of the historical longue durée and to analyze it both in terms of its demographic and cultural dimensions. Starting roughly with the disintegration of the Roman Empire and the phenomenon known as the "barbarian invasions," with the help of distinguished experts, we shall selectively examine phenomena such as the population movements from country to city (both in the Middle Ages and as a consequence of the process of urbanization and industrialization), the movements of people (both as slaves and as free individuals) across the Atlantic, the displacement (either voluntary or forced) of religious and ethnic groups across the European continent from the Renaissance to the end of World War II, the effects of European colonization on population movements out of Europe toward the colonies and toward Europe from the colonial holdings.
